

Stop Making It Harder for People to Get Online

People with low incomes struggle to make ends meet and often have to make difficult choices about how to spend their money to best support their families. This is why so many people are still living without internet access. And those without reliable home internet access are missing out on opportunities to connect to jobs, complete homework and engage in our democracy. Programs like Lifeline are one way to help make broadband access more affordable and provide the tools people need to improve their economic situations.
